

Hello. My name is John Schweitzer, and I live in Asheville, North Carolina.

In 1995, I was diagnosed with AIDS.

The average T cell count of a healthy person is 1500. At the time my diagnosis, my T cell count was at an all time low of 150. One could say I was barely surviving.

In 2001, I went on a combination of prescription drugs designed to treat people with my condition (otherwise known as “the cocktail”). After being on the medication for a short while, my T cell count slowly began to climb. Over the course of the next 8 years it hovered somewhere between 250 and 300 – never hitting anything higher than 300. The cocktail was clearly keeping me alive, but it’s side effects were difficult to live with, and slowly deteriorating my body.

4 months ago, I was introduced to ViaViente and almost immediately began drinking it daily. After being on the product for a month and a half, my T cell count jumped to 420. This is 120 points higher than it has been since I began taking my medication in 2001. In the medical community, the line marking the difference between full-blown AIDS versus an HIV diagnosis is 350. For the first time in my history of having AIDS, I was now considered to not have full-blown AIDS anymore. My diagnosis has currently been reduced to HIV.

Regarding the side effects from my medication - within days of beginning the product, my tongue returned to its natural pink color (it had developed a white film over it for as long as I can remember). I have also been suffering from chronic constipation - where I would have one bowel movement a week if I were lucky. Since taking ViaViente, that has changed to 2 - 3 times a day. My distended stomach (another side effect from all of the medication) has been reduced by about 60%. My skin has been able to retain more moisture (it is not as flaky and dry as it had been prior to taking the product). The collagen in my cheeks has started to fill back in (another side effect from being on the medication). And lastly, I have more energy than I have had in many, many years.

As most people living with HIV/AIDS know, the western medical paradigm seems to force us into a glass box with a glass ceiling, insisting there is nothing else available except for costly and sometimes toxic medications.

ViaViente offers hope for a breakthrough beyond the glass ceiling that is both natural and holistic with its only side effects being aspects of healing, and the promise of a healthier and happier life.

I am truly grateful to ViaViente for the life enhancing properties of its product, as well as the incredible opportunity the company offers for people like me to create a sound financial future.
